Re: Chief Operating Officer — AI Adoption

Michael and Hiring Team,

The role description makes the operating problem unusually clear: the founder should remain in the market, while the company beneath that market energy becomes predictable, profitable, client-retentive, and increasingly AI-enabled. That is not a ceremonial COO seat. It is the work of turning every client promise into an executable operating system.

My career has repeatedly lived at that boundary. At Vape-Jet, I lead an AI-first operating transformation connecting production, purchasing, quality, customer support, engineering issue flow, ERP, CRM, collaboration systems, telemetry, and learning from a fleet of roughly 1,000 fielded robots. At DudeWorth, I have built practical agentic-workflow frameworks connecting context, retrieval, human judgment, evaluation, escalation, governance, adoption, and value. At Amazon, I ran high-velocity operating mechanisms protecting a customer promise at 24/7 scale. At Compunetics, I connected engineering, manufacturing, quality, customers, and technical programs where errors carried real consequences.

The common thread is mechanism building: create one operating truth, name owners, expose drift early, make escalation useful, and turn experience into a stronger next cycle. In this role, I would apply that discipline to sales handoff, scope, utilization, staffing, human-and-agent capacity, delivery control, outcome evidence, renewal, margin, and cash.

I created a role-specific candidate vision at <https://russelldudek.github.io/MDC/>. It makes my reasoning visible through an interactive Promise Compiler, a first-year scorecard, a 120-day entry plan, and a proposed Founder Operating Contract. These are hypotheses for discovery, not claims about the confidential client's undisclosed processes.

I would welcome a conversation about where founder attention is still carrying work the company should carry, which engagement evidence most reliably predicts renewal, and how the firm currently manages AI agents as accountable capacity rather than convenient software.

Carpe diem,

Russell Dudek
